DESCRIPTION

Industry and innovation play a big role in building type and use over time. For example, new economies built around technology and innovation typically involve industrial production; startups often require facilities for small- to mid-scale production, prototyping, and testing; and businesses might blend production and retail components into one space. These programming overlaps can also shift based on the owner's business or educational mission, tenant variables, and whether the building is a conversion or new construction. Join this discussion that intersects technology, business, and building use. You'll get a look at examples that span military, industrial, academic, design, and residential projects.
