DESCRIPTION

While cities occupy just 3.5% of the land area in the United States, 63% of the population lives in those cities. The physical and social fabric of the United States has become increasingly urban-and the role that architecture and design play in making cities socially and environmentally sustainable has become ever more critical. Join a panel of practitioners from diverse cities for a wide-ranging discussion of how urban systems and infrastructure can act as straightjackets or frameworks for resiliency in the face of known and unknown challenges.
